Abstract:	Robinson O. Everett (1928-2009) was an attorney, judge, and a Duke Law professor for over 50 years. He received both his AB (1947) and a law degree (1950) magna cum laude from Harvard. Everett began teaching at Duke Law School shortly after graduating from law school; at 22 years old, he was the youngest person ever to teach at Duke Law. He became a full-time member of the faculty in 1957 and gained tenure in 1967. In 1959, he completed a master's of law degree at Duke. Among the many aspects of his distinguished career he prosecuted four cases in the 1990's that challenged the arrangement of voting districts in North Carolina. All four of these cases eventually reached the US Supreme Court. The Robinson Everett Redistricting Cases Papers span the years 1989-2002, with the bulk of the material being dated between 1992 and 2001. The papers consist primarily of litigation files and depositions created during the prosecution of four cases which questioned the drawing of voting districts in North Carolina. These cases are Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993), Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899 (1996), Hunt V. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541 (1999), and Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234 (2001). Hunt v. Cromartie and Easley v. Cromartie are closely related cases and these materials are grouped together. The collection also contains correspondence, trial exhibits, transcripts, redistricting plans and maps, research, news coverage, and scholarship. The research material includes a great deal of redistricting

information including related cases, statistics, and reports from several sources including the North Carolina General Assembly. Duke Law professor H. Jefferson Powell argued for the state in the US Supreme Court in Shaw v. Reno. Duke Law professor emeritus and former interim dean Walter E. Dellinger represented the state in the Supreme Court in both Cromartie cases.

Content Description

The Everett Redistricting Cases Papers collection includes 42 linear feet of litigation filings, depositions, trial exhibits, correspondence, research, scholarship and more. They are the detailed paper trail of the cases' trajectory up and down the federal court system. After the 1990 Census increased North Carolina's seats in the U.S. House of Representatives from 11 to 12, the state General Assembly created a new apportionment plan with one district drawn to ensure an African-American majority. The U.S. Attorney General's Office objected, stating that the population makeup of the state (78% white, 20% black, and 1% each Native American and Asian) made a single majority-minority district insufficient. In a special legislative session, the General Assembly rewrote the apportionment plan to create an additional majority-minority district. The unusual shapes of the revised districts ("a First District map which looks like a Rorschach ink-blot test and ... a serpentine Twelfth District that slinks down the Interstate Highway 85 corridor," observed Justice Voorhees of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina) led to a federal court challenge by a group of North Carolina voters. Robinson Everett represented the plaintiffs (which originally included himself and fellow Duke Law professor Melvin G. Shimm) in this series of four cases, all of which eventually reached the U.S. Supreme Court: Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993) held that the district's bizarre new boundaries were "unexplainable on grounds other than race," and that the legislature had not provided sufficient justification to withstand a strict-scrutiny examination. The case was remanded to the U.S. District Court. (Note: Duke Law professor H. Jefferson Powell argued for the state in this case. Everett later wrote in prepared remarks to the International Association of Barristers that "[T]his apparently was the first time in the Court's history that two law professors from the same school had argued against each other." A draft of this speech is in the Undated folder in the Scholarly Articles series.) Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899 (1996) confirmed that North Carolina had failed to articulate a compelling government interest for the redrawn Twelfth District, and that the reapportionment plan violated the Equal Protection Clause. (At this point, the Court also held that only residents of the 12th District had standing to continue the suit, which included Professor Shimm but not Judge Everett, who continued to serve as counsel to the remaining eligible plaintiffs.) Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541 (1999) challenged the 1997 redrawing of the Twelfth District. The U.S. District Court had granted summary judgment in this new challenge, holding that the redrawn boundaries still constituted an Equal Protection Clause violation. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded, holding that the legislature's motivation was a genuine issue of material fact which made the case ineligible for summary disposition. Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234 (2001) reviewed the U.S. District Court's finding after remand (from Hunt v. Cromartie, above) that the 1997 legislature's motive was predominantly racial rather than political. The Supreme Court disagreed, reversing the District Court's ruling as "clearly erroneous" and stating, "[T]he party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance. Appellees failed to make any such showing here." (Note: Duke Law professor emeritus and former interim dean Walter E. Dellinger represented the North Carolina governor in both Cromartie cases.)
